Abstract

National alcohol prohibition that was imposed in the United States in 1919 was the result of an effort lasting over a century by those opposed to alcohol on the grounds that it imposed major social and economic costs on society. Once the idea became reality the law of unintended consequences created a new set of problems so severe that by the mid 1920s public opinion had turned against the law. It was repealed in 1933.